client: Mercon Steel

Mercon Steel would like to build a new headquarters building on their Merwede river bank premises. The risk of flooding and the requirements of Rijkswaterstaat (Directorate General of Public Works and Water Management) have resulted in a design in which the building is lifted up off the ground.

The form of the building creates views in all directions, and the floorplans provide for a flexible layout. The energy concept is extremely efficient, with heat and cold storage and low temperature heating and cooling.
